Educating to Achieve Learning

Today's Christian educators should ask themselves, "Why does biblical illiteracy remain so rampant in our churches?" and "How can people attend Sunday school for years and not show evidence of spiritual growth?" Well-respected educator and author Israel Galindo, purports that strong Christian study group leaders hold a key to developing biblically literate, spiritually mature, and committed and faithful believers.

In this important new resource, Christian educators are provided with the perspective and the tools they need to actually be effective as small study group leaders. Instead of just leading discussions, readers will be able to guide participants in learning from themselves and others, connecting with the perspectives and experiences of others in the group, and uncovering and challenging personal assumptions and prejudices. Galindo discusses these and other topics in the context of setting forth a learning approach that will achieve the ultimate goal of Christian education: to bring faith to life.

How to Be the Best Christian Study Group Leader Ever in the Whole History of the Universe provides readers with:

- Clear direction in creating learning objectives, understanding group dynamics, and developing the right questions
- Tools for assessing the effectiveness of small group teaching methods and examples of new learning approaches
- A sample topical Bible study
